EVEN PRESIDENT KENNEDY HAS GRASPED THE SERIOUSNESS OF THIS PROBLEM

President Kennedy decided to set afoot a scheme in order to develop American youth both on the physical and spiritual plane. To this effect President Kennedy requested the services of a famous football trainer, Mr. Charles Wilkinson, who was appointed special sport councillor to the White House.

After leaving the White House, Mr. Charles Wilkinson declared that on the whole, American children were too spoilt by their parents who allowed them often too much freedom with the result that their children often indulged in launching deplorable initiatives. He supported his view by citing the case of students who drove to College in their parents' or in their own car although there were only a few yards to walk. Mr. Wilkinson stressed the fact that he is strongly opposed to this state of affairs which, according to him, is 'encouraging lazy and slothful habits'. He went on to say that he intended to appeal to all parents asking them to exercise more authority over their children in order to give them a firmer standing in education and spiritual development.

Mr. Wilkinson is actually trainer to the football team of Oklahoma University.
