The Carrying of the Olympic Flamme

Modernization reaches out even as far as the Olympic flame. It was in 1936, at the Berlin Games that the carrying of a sacred Olympic flame received its consecration; it had been brought from Olympus to Berlin by couriers, every runner spaced out over the course, while carrying the flame, ran a distance of one kilometre. Thus tradition is lost, for it is by aeroplane that the sacred flame will proceed from Athens, where it will have made its way from Olympus, its birth-place, thanks to the rays of the sun which gave it life, to Innsbruck. Its arrival is timed for January 24th. An official ceremony will take place at the airport of the capital of the Tyrol in the presence of the Olympic and sporting authorities. It will be laid up for five days until January 29th, (why this delay?) the date of the opening of the Games, and it will appear on that day at the Berg-Isel Stadium where it will burn for the duration of the Winter Olympic Games. It will be extinguished on the last day at the Ice Stadium, whence it will have been transported.

Should it be transported by air? It is admissible to Innsbruck during the winter when transport by stages would be a particularly complicated business, or in the case of Tokyo (as was the case of Melbourne in 1956) taking into account the long distance to be covered. In spite of everything, tradition is lost... and yet nobody is responsible, unless it be modern life.
