a society where people are friendlier, warmer, more supportive, freer to be themselves.

Mankind is today walking along a knife edge. Why will we not understand that, with other strengths, naturally, each of which has its dark areas and times of weakness, Olympism can offer the world a recourse, an alternative, a chance which goes far beyond its sporting celebrations?

We all know that our society could rapidly and brutally subside into nothingness. And do we who have inherited, in the form of Olympism, an effective means of counter-attack, a tried and tested weapon ready for combat, have the right to let it rust away in some obscure catacomb? Has not the moment come to combine our forces in the battle for the future, when this is what so many of our contemporaries expect of us? Each of us must decide for himself.

As I wrote recently in the Zürich newspaper "Sport", in the carillon of history, the time may have come for the bell of Olympism to ring out! "In despite of all things!"
